1880

The newer brick building of Third Haven Meeting House is a one-and-a-half story brick building, three bays wide, built in 1879-80 to replace the older frame building erected in 1676. As the practice of segregated meetings, for both men and women had been discontinued in 1879, the Society moved to the new building, which was dedicated in 1880. The newer building was erected at right angles to the old, and consists of a meeting room on the first floor with classrooms above.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The newer Third Haven Meeting House is a rectangular brick building, one-and-a-half stories high, three bays wide and 4 bays long. There is a shallow gable roof with one dormer in each slope; the main entrance is in the gable end which faces east.

This structure was constructed in 1879-80 and shows very restrained Italianate detailing. In general the building reflects the simplicity favored in the Quaker philosophy and style of life.

Brick walls are red orange, laid in common bond; there are buttressed corners. Window openings are emphasized with segmental arches of stretches. Mortar joints are smooth, narrow, and even.

The main entrance in the east gable leads to a stair and entry hall, beyond which is the meeting room. The entire first floor is lit by tall sixteen over sixteen windows with segmentally arch-shaped upper sash. Windows have narrow frames and plain sills; tall louvered shutters with curved tops flank each window.

The windows are placed uniformly, close together along side elevations and in the side bays of the front gable. There are also two window with six over six sash in the attic in the east gable.

The main entrance has a narrow frame segmental arch transom light and double doors with tall narrow upper panels edged with bolection moldings.

The gable dormers have overhanging eaves and window frames which flare at the bottom.

Inside the building has one meeting room on the first floor and classrooms above.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

In 1880 the Thrid Haven Meeting decided to replace the old frame Meeting with a new brick structure. It was a time of change for the old meeting first organized before 1676: the practice of holding separate meetings for men and women was discontinued on December 18, 1879. And the old frame structure was converted into a First Day School when the brick structure was dedicated on January 4, 1880. The building, forty-six feet by thirty-two feet, cost $2,510.58, including seats.

Interestingly, the newer structure is situated at right angles to the older building with the main entry of each in the gable forming a sort of entry court. These structures, the surrounding graveyard and caretakers cottages have been designated a Historic District-in Easton.

This is an attractive well maintained Victorian structure, used as a Quaker meeting house. It is 3 bays wide with the gable end occurring on the front of the building. A double door occupies the front central bay and is heavily paneled. All of the windows are very large 12/12 sashes with segmented-arched tops. The building is 4 bays deep. Characteristic Victorian brick decoration occurs in the use of brick pilasters at each corner of the building and in a row of brick dentils along the roof line of the building. There is one 6/6 peaked dormer on each side of the roof and the gable ends each contain two 6/6 segmented arched windows. This structure is well maintained and very pleasing with it's white trim setting off the orange-hued brick.
